Description: Gluing, bonding, sealing and encapsulating are terms that are used to define the process of producing materials, devices or objects. It is the process of consolidating items or components by bonding them together. Encapsulation is one of the most important production steps in the industry. It protects the items that are put into its package from the external environment. The method of encapsulation involves gluing, laminating, bonding and sealing, but it is not limited to these processes. It could also involve the use of adhesives and other materials to create the protective outer layer. After the process of encapsulation, it is important to protect it from damage. In this sense, there are different methods to protect the package from any external environmental influences, such as sealing, glueing or similar processes. This is important because a lot of factors can affect the material inside the package and it's not always known what these factors are. Sometimes, these factors may be harmful to the item, so the main aim of encapsulation is to protect it from damage. There is a huge number of applications, devices, components and materials that are encapsulated. Some of the industries that use this kind of protection are: • Electronics and telecommunications • Automotive, aerospace and military • Ceramics • Pharmaceuticals • Solar • Lighting • Food There are many packaging materials available and each one of them has its own advantages and disadvantages. The quality of each of these materials is tested and the quantity that is available is sufficient. As a result, one material does not replace the other. There is a huge need for encapsulation in the manufacturing industry. It is a very important process in many fields and it helps to create a quality product. Encapsulation is a process that is used to bind objects or items together using a material, either a compound or an adhesive.
