Is there any standard practice and what would be the typical access pattern to read such entries. I am talking about Microsoft Windows. A: Registry entries like this are dynamically loaded and unload themselves asynchronously in the initialisation / early lifetime of your application. This is one of the reasons why it is very hard to access "standardized" information from this Registry - you have to iterate through the keys in order to find what you're looking for. For the /MACHINE\Software\Microsoft\Windows\CurrentVersion\Run: it loads the DLL from the %SystemRoot% directory, and it can be seen in the reg file when it's all over. The same goes for the main application executable, and all the helper executables for that. But if you read them in at this point, they'll just be unload without a hitch! you're like to be falling asleep in this one, too. ?
