Among the most devastating lessons you learn during the summer after your freshman year of college is that your peers' opinions of you are often informed by very little more than the fact that you have been enrolled in a college or university for a year, and a rather large part of that year has involved you living with someone in a residential hall. As such, it has been an especially trying summer for me as I have been sharing a dorm with a small, close-knit group of students. Each of the people in my dorm room is extremely high-achieving, talented, and has many positive qualities to their personality. One day, one of the boys in my room, a friend and fellow CSA candidate, mentioned to me that at his school, it was common knowledge that a female "plays around" with a variety of guys on campus, that she's a slut and treats guys like sex toys. In other words, she's the type of person who's too good for her own good and not worthy of my respect as a male student. The first thing to say is that, while I didn't know any of these things about my friend, I had a brief conversation with him (over drinks) where he told me he felt that she was slutting around on campus. Afterwards, my friend and I talked about how ridiculous this was and agreed that we didn't need to bring that stuff up around her or anyone else — and especially not a female. The next day, my roommate was in class, which meant I had a few hours to myself. I started talking to a few of my friends about my conversation with the previous night, which led to my roommate's roommate telling me that his roommate has been hearing that I've been sleeping with girls over the summer. We both agreed that this sort of behavior was completely unacceptable and that the way to rectify the situation was to not discuss it with other people, but rather to directly confront the offending person to tell them that you're not going to be treated in such a way. My roommate, however, told me that they couldn't do that because she hadn't actually said those things to him and he was hesitant to press the issue
