So I have a program that uses some form-like data entry in a user control (not a Windows Form app). The form is not design-time, and comes in after the control, but before the main form that lets the user do stuff. The reason for this is it breaks the normal flow of the application -- the control is how the user navigates to the main form. I could put it before the main form, or make it the main form, but I don't want to mess with the client's code, so I want to make it work as it is. I can place the control on the main form, and put code in the event handlers to use it as navigation points, but to make it easy for the users, I'd like to make it part of the "main form" (the main form is what gets shown in the client). I cannot change the design since the users will not be able to use this form any other way. I am also not designing the control, only writing it. It is possible to have a form inside a module, but I don't know how to create the form when it is not in the client project. In other words, how do I dynamically create the form when it is loaded, and have it created the same way that a user created it, rather than the programmer writing the code? Update: Found the answer on MSDN A: After digging around the net, I found the answer on MSDN: <http://msdn.microsoft.com/en-us/library/c5zy3zce%28v=vs.80%29.aspx> at or follow us on Twitter: @EPEngage [^2]: a model where the error is propagated through the network, independently of the input size [^3]: a model where the error does not propagate [^4]: [^5]: [^6]: Q: How to reference the PowerShell file that is being sourced When I source a PowerShell script from a different directory, I'd like it to import all of the variables that have been defined in the script being sourced. I don't want to manually copy/paste the variables that I have in my working directory into the script being sourced. I'm having a hard time finding documentation that would help me find the file that I'm sourcing. I'm wondering if this isn't the expected behavior. Thanks. A: To start off, please see the Introduction to Powershell scripting on PowerShell.org, or any of the rest of the modules at the PowerShell.org site. Having read through the information, you have the following options. The Powershell module for sourcing content stored in a file In PowerShell 4.
